Azaleas

We have an exceptionally large assortment of fine, hardy plants and varieties. Some of these are very dwarf growing shrubs with small flowers; others are larger growing shrubs with brilliant, large flowers of nearly every color. They are especially well suited for group plantings, mixed with Rhododendrons, Mountain Laurel and the Andromeda varieties, but will lend themselves splendidly for single planting, or even for hedges, and the smaller types for rock gardens. These groups of the Ericaceae species of Azaleas and Rhododendrons, and also those of the Andromeda varieties, including our precious native Mountain Laurel will be the coming leading nursery stock in the East.

AZALEA calendulacea, Flame Azalea, 6-12 ft.

With colors ranging from yellow to orange and flame, this is one of the best native Azaleas.

Rhododendrons

Since the beginning of the cultivation of nursery stock, nurserymen have been deeply concerned with producing new and more suitable species from native plants and trees. While a great deal of progress has been made through careful selection and hybridizing, another one of our Ericaceae family has gained considerably from these efforts, and they are represented in our many varied and colorful Rhododendrons. With many trials and errors as well as successes, varieties have been produced, many of which beautify our landscape today with both color and form. Also, here, we have literally thousands of them in many varieties of color, shades and sizes for you to choose from.
